For some of the countries, such as Angola, Guinea and Cameroon — poor African nations whose concerns drew little attention before they landed seats on the council — there is the possibility that supporting the resolution may reap financial benefits from the United States. But members of the council who support continued inspections are also lobbying hard.

Washington has reserved the right to wage war with a coalition of willing nations, but U.N. backing would provide legitimacy and financial support for military action and its aftermath. On Monday, Turkey's Cabinet agreed to host tens of thousands of U.S. combat troops, a key step toward allowing Washington to forge ahead with plans for a northern front against Iraq.

The draft resolution does not set any deadlines. But U.S. and British officials made clear they want the Security Council to vote by mid-March.

In a bid to win council support, the one-page draft resolution never mentions the words "war" or "military action." It doesn't declare Iraq in further "material breach" of its U.N. obligations, or call for "all necessary means" to be used against Iraq, as the Bush administration initially wanted.

tory and geography that neither seem to realize, he said.

"Terrible things have come from European warfare," Moser said. "No one wants to support Saddam and his rule but they are against war and they are for organizations like the United Nations."

Bush's public statements that the United States will act without the United Nations if necessary disturbs Europeans, Moser said.

"Can the president afford to say that the Congress is irrelevant if they don't pass what he wants them to, and act alone?" Moser said.

U.S. officials asked Austria for use of their airspace as well as deployment of Austrian troops to Turkey but were denied both because Austria's constitution mandates that it be neutral in international conflict.

He received hundreds of e-mails from people on both sides of the issue when the denial was publicized.

"We got flak for not supporting the United States and we got support from those who are against the war," Moser said. "The whole time we were neutral."

Austria would have given support if the United States had first been successful in obtaining a U.N. resolution for troop support.

Moser said critics accused Austria for its neutrality as a way to welcome Saddam as they did Hitler in World War II. He responded by saying Europeans simply do not like unilateral decisions and that diplomacy is the best way to address conflict.

"'Justice without power is ridiculous, but power without justice is abominable'," Moser said. "That's what we are working out with the Americans."

Orem city and UVSC grapple with growth

By ZACHARY WEST

Orem and Utah Valley State College officials are looking at ways to deal with the 15,000 people expected to enter the zoning district soon.

"Our projection for Orem city population capacity is between 105,000 and 110,000 people," said Christopher Tschirki, Orem transportation and private development engineer. "Unless Orem changes its zoning limits or building restrictions, Orem will have difficulty in housing and transporting that many people."

The U.S. Census reports 84,324 citizens live in Orem city limits.

UVSC will account for much of the Orem population growth, adding stress as the city continues to develop.

According to the UVSC Web site, projected growth for the UVSC student body is between 34,000 and 44,700 by 2011, a 47 percent increase.

"These measurements are based on historical growth rates at UVSC, and we don't expect it to slow down," said UVSC spokesman Derek Hall. "The growth rate of Utah Valley has great impact on us."

Hall said the number of high school graduates will increase in the next 10 to 15 years. About 65 percent of UVSC students come from Utah County, and 90 percent of students come from the state of Utah.

"We have an open door policy," Hall said. "We try to accommodate as many students as possible. We turn away a couple thousand students a year because of state funding problems, and students can't get classes at the time they need them. We have room for growth."

UVSC is constructing two buildings that will be finished next summer to accommodate more growth.

With that growth will come cars, traffic, housing and an influx of business to Orem and Provo.

"Each day, during peak traffic times, we experience traffic failure because the road system we have was designed for about 24,000 students," Hall said.

Orem officials are also concerned with the traffic problem on University Parkway and the I-15 off ramps near UVSC. In response, officials are conducting the South West Area Transportation study.

A Filipino protester carries a burning American flag Monday during a protest outside the U.S. embassy in Manila. The demonstrators protested against a possible U.S.-led strike on Iraq.

Philippine minister accuses U.S. officials of inaccuracies

KUALA LUMPUR, Malaysia (AP) — The Philippine foreign minister on Monday accused "junior officials" in Washington of falsely stating U.S. troops would engage in combat alongside Philippine soldiers to fight militants in the Southeast Asian nation.

Unidentified Pentagon officials were quoted last week as saying more than 1,000 U.S. troops, including 350 special operations soldiers, would deploy for combat against the Islamic militant Abu Sayyaf group in the southern Philippine island of Jolo.

No date was given.

Philippine officials immediately denied the reports, saying there would be no combat role for the U.S. troops.

"These reports emanate from junior officials who don't know what they are talking about," Philippine Foreign Secretary Blas Ople told reporters on the sidelines of the Non-Aligned Movement Summit in Malaysia.

Such an active role for U.S. troops would be a big leap from the counterterrorism advice, training and support given so far in the fight against the group.

A Pentagon spokesman said Friday a plan to send U.S. troops to the Philippines for "joint operations" was reached after months of talks.

"As we have stated, the United States and Philippine governments have agreed to conduct combined operations in the southern Philippines to disrupt and defeat the Abu Sayyaf group," said spokesman Lt. Cmdr Jeff Davis.

Alligator attacks woman

ENGLEWOOD, Florida (AP) — A 70-year-old woman was in fair condition Monday after an alligator ripped off part of her arm as she trimmed brush outside her condo, officials said.

The 8-foot 3-inch alligator latched on to Helena Couto's arm just below the elbow Sunday and tried to drag her into a nearby pond, said Gary Morse, a spokesman for the Florida Fish and Wildlife Conservation Commission. She was saved by a resident who managed to pull her away, More said.

"A neighbor came to the rescue and had her by the legs," he said.

A deputy shot and killed the alligator. Wildlife commission officials cut into the alligator and retrieved the arm, which was then flown to Tampa General Hospital where Couto was awaiting surgery to reattach it, Charlotte County spokesman Robert Carpenter said. Hospital spokeswoman Ellen Fiss wouldn't say Monday whether the surgery was successful.

Crash kills Afghan minister

KARACHI, Pakistan (AP) — Afghanistan's minister of mines and industry died along with seven other people Monday when their plane crashed in the Arabian Sea shortly after takeoff from the southern Pakistan port city of Karachi.

Juma Mohammed Mohammedi, a member of the vast Afghan diaspora who returned home to help rebuild his country after the fall of the Taliban, was on his way to inspect a copper mine in northwestern Pakistan when the Cessna 402 crashed.

Four other Afghan officials, a Chinese businessman and the two-member crew also died in the accident. Authorities found the wreckage floating in the sea and recovered six bodies, said naval spokesman Roshan Khayal.

The plane took off from Karachi's international airport en route to Jazak, a town near the Iranian border.

Sun Changshen, the Pakistan representative of the China Metallurgical Construction Co., which runs the copper mine, was also killed in the crash.

Mohammedi wanted to learn techniques that could be used in his country's copper mines.

Spy avoids death penalty

ALEXANDRIA, Va. (AP) — Convicted spy Brian Patrick Regan was spared the death penalty Monday by a U.S. District Court jury.

Regan was convicted last week of offering to sell intelligence to Iraq and China. The jury resumed deliberations and determined on Monday that he did not offer Iraq documents concerning nuclear weaponry, military satellites, war plans or other major U.S. weapons systems — allegations that could have brought the death penalty.

Ethel and Julius Rosenberg were the last Americans put to death for spying. They were executed in 1953 for conspiring to steal U.S. atomic secrets for the Soviet Union.

Regan will be sentenced May 9 and could receive life imprisonment.

The 40-year-old married father of four from Bowie, Md., was arrested Aug. 23, 2001, at Dulles International Airport outside Washington while boarding a flight for Zurich, Switzerland.

China eager to help on Iraq

BEIJING (AP) — Chinese officials rejected Secretary of State Colin Powell's appeal Monday for a regional approach to the North Korean nuclear standoff and called for direct talks between the United States and Pyongyang to resolve concerns over the communist nation's nuclear weapons programs.

Colin Powell
Greets Chinese President Jiang Zemin

On Iraq, Powell urged Chinese support for a second U.N. Security Council resolution that would authorize military action if President Saddam Hussein refuses to disarm, but the Chinese stood by their longstanding position that U.N. inspections should continue. It was not clear whether China would exercise its veto power if a second resolution is voted on by the Council.

North Korea and Iraq dominated separate meetings Powell held with Foreign Minister Tang Jiaxuan, Vice President Hu Jintao and President Jiang Zemin.

matic biology is con- with the genealogy of life and how evolutionary processes can cause genetic diversity. Bioinformatics, a relatively new field of science, mixes mathematics, biology, statistics and computer technology in order to analyze molecular data.

Rogers is also the principal investigator for BYU's research site. The principal investigator, along with two co-principal investigators, decides which 10 students will receive the research opportunities.

Rogers said he is planning to select five students from other universities and five students from BYU, although those plans may change depending on the applications.

Students chosen to participate in the program can expect a $3,000 stipend.

Research opportunities at BYU's research site will include HIV evolution, conservation genetics, phylogeny reconstruction and molecular evolution.

"The more we can do to individualize (a student's) education and get them some hands-on experience, the better off they're going to be," said Keith Crandall, an associate professor in integrative biology who will be participating in the program.

Students interested in applying to the research experience program at BYU can go to the link to the application site on the Department of Integrative Biology home page.

Joshua Jones, a conservation biology student, works with DNA in the Whiting Lab in the Widtsoe Building. The lab will be used by students involved in the REU research during the spring and summer.

Rogers said students should apply for one of the research positions by March 31.

The research projects begin on May 27, and continue until Aug. 2. In addition to student and faculty interaction, students will participate in a weekly workshop where to learn about ethics in science, and how to read and write a scientific paper.

Students selected to participate in the research program can expect lots of work, "but a rewarding experience that will better prepare them for graduate school and a career in science," said Michael Whiting, an assistant professor of integrative biology who will be participating in the student-mentoring program.

The $225,000 grant that makes BYU's lab site possible will last three years, at which point BYU can apply for a renewal.

REU sites are more likely to be renewed by NSF if the 10 students chosen each summer are diverse.

ach diplomats said the -German-Russian plan, includes strengthened U.N. s inspections, can be ented under existing U.N. resolutions and would be submitted as a memorandum.

"The aim is to establish a timetable for Iraq's disarmament, program by program, relating to weapons of mass destruction," French President Jacques Chirac told reporters in Berlin before talks with German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder.

"The Security Council must step up its efforts to give a real chance to the peaceful settlement of this crisis," the French, Russian and German paper said.

Despite the stiff resistance in the council, British Ambassador Jeremy Greenstock, who walked into the chamber together with the ambassadors of the United States and Spain, formally submitted the resolution on behalf of the three countries at a closed meeting Monday.

Greenstock accused Iraq of remaining in defiance of the United Nations, doing "everything possible to prevent unrestricted interviews" with scientists, turning inspections into a "media circus," and providing no cooperation on substantive issues.

U.S. Ambassador John Negroponte called on the council to support the "prompt adoption of this very straightforward resolution. Iraq itself must bear the consequences of its continued disregard for the council's decisions," he said.

Both statements to the closed session were distributed by diplomats.

President Bush told U.S. governors earlier Monday that the resolution "spells out what the world has witnessed the last months. The Iraq regime has not disarmed. The Iraqi regime is not disarming as required by last fall's unanimous vote of the Security Council."

He pressed the council to adopt the resolution.

"It's a moment for this body ... to determine whether or not it's going to be relevant as the world confronts threats in the 21st century. Is it going to be a body that means what it says? We certainly hope so," Bush said.

The president said the administration will work with the Security Council "in the days ahead" on the resolution. He did not set a timetable, though his spokesman said Britain's calls for a mid-March vote were fine with the president.

Nonetheless, the next six days are critical for Saddam.

Top U.N. inspectors Hans Blix and Mohamed ElBaradei say Iraq still isn't fully cooperating or providing evidence to answer outstanding questions about its nuclear, chemical, biological and long-range missile programs.

To demonstrate that Iraq is cooperating, Saddam must not only show that Iraq is doing more to answer those questions. He must also comply with Blix's order to begin destroying all of Iraq's Al Samoud 2 missiles and the engines and components for them by Saturday.

Iraq has withheld a decision on destroying the missile program

But in an interview Monday with CBS anchor Dan Rather, Saddam indicated he did not intend to destroy his Al-Samoud 2 missiles, CBS said on its Web site.

Saddam also challenged Bush to an internationally televised debate, CBS said.

Rather was to report on the comments on the Monday evening newscast, and CBS planned to broadcast the interview in its entirety on Wednesday.

Kathy Rakisits, of the UVSC off-campus housing office, said 50 percent of UVSC students live at home and none of the 14 housing complexes near UVSC is full.

War on porn

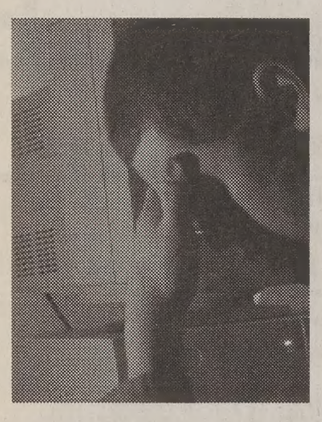
Pornography battle requires firm action

You've heard of the war on drugs. What about the war on pornography?

Last week BYU's Women's Services and Resources sponsored their annual Cyber Secrets conference, which aimed at disseminating information about the problem of pornography. We applaud those professionals from BYU and all over the world who battle this issue in a public forum and offer solutions to this rampant addiction.

Statistics show that the No. 1 use for the Internet today is pornography. Last year, there were more than 40,000 sex-related Web sites. That number increases daily, as well as the number of broken homes, sex-related and other violent crimes, and the emotional damage resulting from this terrible disease.

BYU isn't the only organization fighting this issue. Utah's legislature has drafted a bill that would impose a 10 percent tax on all sex-related industries, which will go toward funding the porn czar's job and related efforts.



Many have criticized the bill saying bans on pornography deny a person's constitutional rights of free speech and expression. However, the effects from a pornography addiction affect everyone.

BYU's Cyber Secrets conference documented that 77 to 87 percent of child molesters admitted imitating the behavior they'd seen in pornography and that "rape rates are highest in states which have high sales of sex magazines."

Therefore, such an argument is like saying that we shouldn't try to prohibit drug or alcohol addictions because they encroach on our rights. Just as alcoholism is an illness, which has real secondary effects on society, more and more social psychologists categorize pornography addictions as a verifiable illness.

Even Europe, which has been known for its thriving porn industries, has decided to crack down on this issue, recognizing its inherent ills that threaten the "moral and mental well-being of young people." French government-appointed regulators are now "urging channels to drop the porn and at the same time lobbying the legislature for the power to force compliance if TV executives don't go along."

Such bold and courageous actions by both governments deserve our support. Pornography is becoming more commonplace in our own country with contemptible effects on society.

We believe this battle is one worth fighting.

Real representation

BYUSA: Service with a smile

By DAVID RANDALL

BYUSA elections are finally over. Some are cheering, some are crying and many are asking, "Who cares?"

Part of election time is having BYUSA held up to scorn. It's when all of the students can talk about how they are under represented. They can complain about how BYUSA doesn't do anything for them and how it is just a sham operation for overachievers who want to try and lord over their fellow students and throw themselves parties.

Many student complaints have merit. They may feel their BYU experience might not be much different without the Juggling Club or the Fall Fling or so many of the dances they never go to.

Students may also feel they will never be affected by BYUSA's student leadership programs or the soapbox and Student Advisory Council they sponsor.

And, as far as elections are concerned, students may feel there will be relatively few changes any BYUSA presidency can make that will have any visible effect on the way the campus operates.

This is also the way I felt, to some extent, for most of my time at BYU. But that was before one of my good friend asked me to be on a campaign. Suddenly I was meeting new people that helped me see another side of BYU's student leadership — the side of giving rather than getting.

I have long considered myself a journalist who liked the safety of impartiality and cynicism. It's easy not to have an opinion, and most of the time it's easy to argue against anyone who does. At BYU, and almost everywhere I've been, I've felt practically surrounded by cynics.

But when I went to work on the campaign, I was suddenly alone in my cynicism and surrounded by people with ideas and willingness to serve and make BYU better. I met people who were more worried about giving back to the university than taking from it.

They seemed to answer the question for me about why we have a BYUSA or at least see the potential that the organization has. BYUSA has the potential to allow students to serve and make a difference in the lives of other students through clubs, programs and service projects.

No doubt there are wasted man-hours and wasted funds at BYUSA. No doubt there are self-promoting cliques that form and small groups that some might classify as secret combinations.

But the people I've seen who are involved in the organization seem to exude a quality that can only improve the university and the students.

Maybe it is not an organization that can please all of those who are waiting to take from the university, but it definitely has the potential to help all those who are willing to give something back.

That is why it seems a student service organization should exist, for those who are going to give. The rest of the students can continue to whine and withhold their votes from BYUSA elections.

Who cares? Lots of people, I've come to find. Let's just hope the new BYUSA president can use their efforts and ideas to improve our campus community.

Forgotten fury

I find it amusing that we can so easily forget the events that have occurred in our country. After the tragedy of September 11, we, as Americans, were so quick to point fingers at The White House. Though they had no proof of an attack they had insider information. Many in the country blamed Bush and his staff claiming they should have done something to prevent the horrible event.

Now many of the same society that criticized our leaders for not preventing September 11 are the same citizens who are now condemning the president for trying to prevent another tragedy. Do we not remember that we wanted our government to try to catch terrorist before they could strike again? Now that they are trying to fulfill our wishes we ask where the smoking gun is. We must as citizens help our leaders finish what we asked them to start.

And as far as those wearing armbands claiming it is not a protest, at least have the courage to call the charade what it is. A protest, according to Webster's Dictionary, is an "act of objecting or a gesture of disapproval."

Though it may be not be radical, involving burning of flags or use of illegal drugs, it is a protest. Of course nobody likes war but when our leaders (chosen by the process of democracy) are attempting to gain the world's support for this war, it doesn't help when our own people cannot unite.

Those who wear an armband are in protest. If they are afraid to state that, maybe they should take them off.

Battle of the bands

I'd like to pose a question to those students sporting armbands to oppose war in Iraq. Would they also be willing to wear armbands that say, "Allow the rape of Iraqi women" or "Maintain the torture of Iraqis?" The point is that support for inaction is sanction of such behavior.

Yes, war is bad, but peace could be worse. What is the price of peace? An entire generation of Iraqis subjected to torture, rape, being gassed, etc.? Peace at any cost? No thank you. Such a despot as Hussein is certainly a threat to his own people and soon will be a threat to the world.

I sincerely hope that such student display of sentiment against action in Iraq is simply an example of hubris and not a well-considered opinion. As for the professors who have such opinions, I can only guess.

No one wants to see war. Certainly its consequences will be devastating on both sides. But to do nothing would not only bring devastation, but condemnation on the heads of those who did nothing.

Ingratitude attitude

I'm not from the states, but I have dual-citizenship and the anti-war/Bush displays really bother me. I'm not a warmonger, but I can certainly tell the difference between a war of aggression and a war of defense. I'm tired of Americans who claim freedom and its benefits for themselves, yet condemn all those living outside these borders. People walking around with armbands with anti-war slogans are ungrateful, outwardly showing their unwillingness to help out a neighbor if sacrifice is involved.

While Sean Penn's announcement that Baghdad is "free of weapons of mass destruction" may sway some from supporting President Bush, I prefer more factual information.

We're with stupid

The two recent nightclub tragedies have made me wonder why terrorists even target our country.

What caused the accident in Rhode Island? The stage caught fire due to pyrotechnics allegedly used without permission. What's more, the careless spraying of mace caused the mass hysteria that resulted in the deaths of 21 individuals in Chicago.

The stupid people of America are doing a better job at causing terror than terrorists are. Instead of a Department of Homeland Security, the U.S. government needs to instate a Federal Bureau for the Prevention of Stupid People.

Unfortunately, Darwin had it wrong. Even though the fittest in nature survive, the fittest humans are usually off'd by some idiot, hence propagating the race of stupid Americans.

I don't see why terrorists even bother with us.

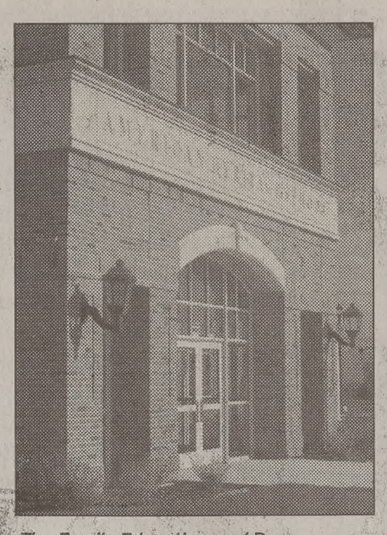
LDS speakers visit local private school

Lectures target parents; promote family values in light of gospel truth

By JORDAN BURKE



The Family Education and Resource Center at American Heritage School located in American Fork, will sponsor a monthly lecture series starting Friday.

A new family lecture series aims to help parents raise their children in a strong LDS environment.

"We want people to come and learn more about the principles it takes to have a strong family life," said Gaylord Swim, chairman of the board for the American Heritage School in American Fork. "We're trying to study all subjects in light of gospel truths."

The series, put on by the school's Family Education and Resource Center, will present a different speaker monthly starting Friday.

Each couple will address how to raise families with values similar to those endorsed by The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. The center acts as an extension of the school's founding organization.

"We want to take advantage of all the material and the resources available because of the restored gospel," Swim said. "We're not just a Christian school. We're an LDS Christian school."

This Friday Dr. Stephen Covey, co-founder and vice-chairman of FranklinCovey Co., and his wife, Sandra, are scheduled to speak.

Future speakers include Margaret D. Nadauld, former Young Women General President of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints and her husband Stephen.

The private American Heritage School was created more than 30 years ago to offer an LDS based education for younger children, Swim said.

"This lecture series is targeted to adults, especially to young married couples," Swim said.

The idea of learning how to help families improve their relations appeals to members of the local community.

"They are trying to develop a resource to the community for teaching materials that extends beyond traditional schools and provide the community with quick access to materials, rather than spending hours in the librar," said Chad Nelson of Orem.

The center is "designed for parents, to support them wherever they may be," said John Covey, the center's director.

Smallpox Vaccinations issued in Utah County

By LISA MILLETT

Smallpox vaccinations in Utah County will be given to emergency support personnel beginning this month as part of an emergency preparedness plan for health departments throughout the country.

"There is no imminent threat of smallpox in Utah," said Justin Jones, public information officer of the Utah County Department of Health. "This plan is just to prepare us so that in an event of a smallpox threat, we will be ready."

On Jan. 3, the county health department submitted to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention in Atlanta the Smallpox Pre-event Vaccination Plan, a three-phase precaution plan in case of a smallpox outbreak.

Once the three-phase plan is approved, the county health department will implement the plan near the end of January or beginning of February because of federal regulations.

Jones said the plan's first phase would focus on vaccinating doctors, nurses and support personnel in the emergency room.

The second phase will vaccinate emergency responders who would be the first to respond to a smallpox outbreak.

The third phase, which will vaccinate the general population, will not be implemented until 2004.

According to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, smallpox is a serious, contagious and sometimes fatally infectious disease.

Contageous individuals pass the virus through prolonged face-to-face contact with another person, direct contact with a person who has the disease or through contaminated items that an infected person has touched.

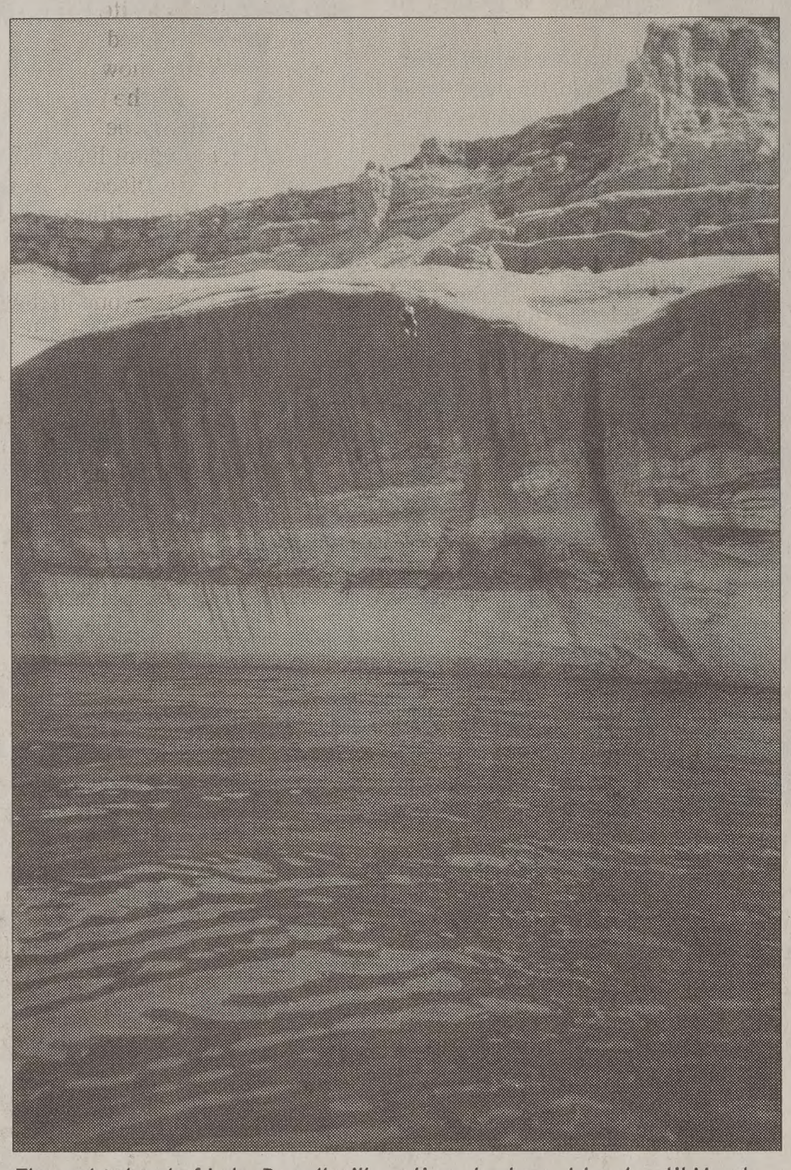
Powell low, but too low

Marinas, most ramps open despite low water levels

By ELIZABETH STOHLTON



The water level of Lake Powell will continue to drop at least until March when it will reach its lowest level since May 29, 1973.

Melanie Hunter is concerned she won't be able to enjoy boating at Lake Powell this year because of the low water levels, but according to state officials, she has nothing to worry about — yet.

Hunter, a 19-year-old junior from Sandy, majoring in pre-nursing, goes to Lake Powell every summer with her family.

"My family owns a time share in a house boat so we go down about 2-3 weeks every summer," she said. "Last summer, we went down there, and it was already getting low.

Hunter said she is concerned that with the low water levels her family won't be able to get their houseboat in and out of the water.

"We usually put our house boat in at Wahweap so we can take it out whenever we want to because we don't have a slip, but with all of the ramp closures it will be nearly impossible to take our houseboat in and out, maybe making it impossible to take it at all," she said.

However, National Park Service spokeswoman Char Obergh said there are a lot of misconceptions about Lake Powell.

"The lake is at the level it was 20 years ago," she said. "The lake level is going to go down lower than it has been."

Barry Wirth, regional public affairs director for the Bureau of Reclamation, said Lake Powell is 87 feet from full. Wirth said it will continue to go down until at least March, when the lake will hit its lowest water level mark since May 29, 1973.

The last three years, the in flow of water at Lake Powell has totaled 18.5 million acre-feet of water, Wirth said. He said 8.23 million acre-feet of water has to be released every year from the Glen Canyon Dam which is why the water level is going down.

"When we hit the low point in March, we'll have 12.5 million acre-feet of water still remaining," he said.

Wirth said Lake Powell depends on the winter runoff, and last year the runoff wasn't sufficient to make the lake rise.

"The question we're anxiously trying to sort out, and time will only help, is whether we'll have that problem again," Wirth said.

He said the state is not getting the storms it typically gets.

"An awful lot is riding on the historical storms we would see in March and April," Wirth said. "We really need them to come."

He said the state needs a wet spring to make a difference; however, Wirth said because the soil in the upper basin is so dry, unless there is a substantial amount of moisture, most of the water won't make it to the reservoirs.

"We need more than just one or two storms," he said. "We need a really stormy March and April period."

Wirth said the area needs 150 percent of its normal snow pack to make the lake rise, and currently the snow pack is only 58 percent of normal.

Obergh said because of the low water level, many people are under the impression there are several marina and ramp closures, but she said those rumors are only partially true.

"None of the marinas are closed," Obergh said.

However, while none of the marinas are closed, there are some ramps that are closed.

"We are going to be facing some challenges," she said. "Some of are ramps are currently unavailable."

The Wahweap state line ramp is closed and measures are in place to extend the ramp when the lake reaches its lowest level, Obergh said.

Ramps at Bullfrog and Halls Crossing marinas are being extended, Obergh said.

She said the main ramp at Hite Marina is closed because of the low water level, but a temporary dirt ramp is open. Public ramps at Halls Crossing, Bullfrog and Wahweap marinas are open, but the public ramp at Antelope Point is inaccessible because of the water level.

Obergh said Hite Marina, the northern most marina on the lake, is the only marina facing challenges because of the water level. She said the National Park Service is working on ways to improve Hite Marina before the summer.

"You may expect delays in launching this year because some of our ramps are closed and there is limited launch space," she said.

There are also rumors about the fate of the Charles Hall and the John Atlantic Burr ferries.

According to the Associated Press, because of the low water level, the ferry ramps are unusable and the Utah Department of Transportation doesn't want to pay the extra money to build new piers.

The ferries, that carry automobiles and passengers, run between Bullfrog and Halls Crossing marinas. Obergh said the ferries are still running and the National Park Service is looking at possible solutions so the ferry service doesn't stop altogether.

Obergh said the ferries use the ramps at Bullfrog and Halls Crossing marinas; however, because some of the ramps are closed at those marinas, they need more space for people to launch their boats.

Joan Nevillf-Staveley, director of the Page/Lake Powell Chamber of Commerce, said the only people she thinks that will be affected if the ferry service closes are those who want to cross the lake from Halls Crossing to Bullfrog marinas to get their houseboat.

"It will add about 90 miles to their trip each way," she said.

Nevillf-Staveley said people who don't have their own slips (places to dock their houseboats) won't have a problem launching a boat.

"The Wahweap main ramp is fine and they can keep moving the slips and the buoys out," she said. "There is no problem."

However, she said moving the slips and buoys out only makes for a long walk up the ramp.

She said she doesn't think the water level will make a difference with the number of visitors to Lake Powell. Nevillf-Staveley said between 2.5 and 3 million people visit Lake Powell each year.

With the low water level, Nevillf-Staveley said the face of the lake is changing — in some way for the better.

"The beaches are just glorious," she said. "There are a lot more open hiking opportunities. It's becoming more like it used to be."

Bill to target illegal drink

By LEAH ELISON

SALT LAKE CITY — A bill that aims to decrease illegal consumption of alcohol in Utah without crippling the state's hospitality industry advanced Friday one step closer to passing the Senate.

Senate Bill 153, co-sponsored by Senate Majority Whip John Valentine, R-Orem, received unanimous approval from the Senate after being substituted and then amended.

"There is a mirage sometimes that Utah has the most restrictive liquor laws in the United States," said Senate Minority Whip Ron Allen, D-Stansbury Park, the bill's second sponsor. "That is really not the case."

The bill makes several changes to the Alcohol Beverage Title to both toughen liquor laws and accommodate the industry.

To decrease over-consumption of alcohol, a drink's alcohol content would be limited to 2.75 ounces.

Restaurants would be required to stay open one hour after the bar closes so that patrons can sober up before leaving. During that hour, patrons would only be allowed to drink one serving of alcohol.

S.B. 153 would make special events permits easier to obtain, create a new license for restaurants serving only beer and wine and permit patrons to take home wine they did not consume.

Penalties for serving alcohol to minors and intoxicated individuals would also be increased under the bill.

The Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control would receive approximately $1.3 million from the Liquor Control Fund.

The bill increases the number of reasons minors would be allowed in bars.

"I don't want minors in bars, but I am willing to make some concessions," Valentine said.

Under the bill, minors would be allowed in bars if they were an employee of a bar owned by their parents, if the they were in the food serving area or were hired to do cleaning and maintenance after hours.

An amendment was adopted to accommodate small Utah wineries by increasing licensing fees by $200 instead of Last semester, 85 percent of BYU's students used campus computers, according to statistics taken by OACL employees.

Surveys distributed through Open Access Computer Labs showed many students are getting tired of the long lines and the lack of computers on campus.

"Students are telling us, 'What you've got is great; you just don't have enough of it,'" Hunt said.

With more than 30,000 students on campus, one more 48-computer lab may have a huge effect on shortening lines.

"It adds more computers so people don't have to walk as far," said Jill Barton, 21, a senior at BYU who has gone through years of line waiting. "If there are no computers here, I'll have to go to the Kimball Tower or some other place, but I don't think 48 computers makes too much of a difference."

O'Connell and Hunt both said they are constantly looking for opportunities to meet students' computing needs.

The new computer lab's hours mirror those of its neighboring lab.

The two labs are open 7:30 a.m. to 11:30 p.m., Monday through Friday.

Computer program aids career search

By ERICA STARR

Discovering possibilities for the future is the main purpose of the new eDiscover, a career planning program students can now access online.

"Discover is a user-friendly online career counseling tool designed to help students clarify their career interests and abilities, select a major and, eventually, search for a job," said David Smart, counseling and career assistant director. "The program has been revised and updated a number of times and is now easier to access and understand."

The program, created by The American College Testing Program, was only accessible at the Career and Learning Information Center and selected labs on campus in the past.

In January, Discover became available at BYU online.

According to Sharlet Doxey, CLIC manager, Discover is free of charge to students because the university pays a site license for the program.

BYU paid a site license when there was limited access to the program, but now all BYU students can use the program from all computers free.

"Each student has to receive an ID to use Discover from the CLIC, which is different from a student ID number," Doxey said. "If they didn't have the individual IDs, then anyone in the United States could go online and use the program."

Once students log on with their individual ID, they can create their own portfolio through taking the interest, ability and value inventories.

These inventories help students decide what colleges to go to, their majors and their occupations.

The inventories display certain activities, and students report whether they like, dislike or are indifferent to each activity.

The inventory scores are used to place the student on the "World-of-Work" map. This map shows the jobs that match with the student's interests, skills or values and gives a summary of each job, including the average salary and outlook.

"I'm just looking for career information – what it takes to get into a career – and I've found there's a lot of information," said Kurt Atkins, 21, open major, Tucson, Ariz. "It's nice because it's all collected, as opposed to trying to use the filing system. I like it because it's really current information with all of the latest reports because it's all online."

Versatility is one of the program's assets because it has a vast amount of information, Smart said.

"It's a pretty complete package for students who may want to access it at various stages of their college experience from choosing a major as a freshman or sophomore, to narrowing career choices as a junior or senior, to applying for and interviewing for a job as a graduating senior," Smart said.

Web site helps Y students network

By SARAH BILLS

It's one of the top five ways to get a job, but most students don't understand how it works.

Simply put, networking means talking with people – family, friends, acquaintances and experts – about available jobs.

"It doesn't mean just talking to one or two people; it means talking to anyone and everyone," said Debbie Gibbons, an adviser with Career Placement Services. "Most jobs are found through networking. It is probably the easiest way to get your foot in the door."

BYU Alumni's Web site offers students or alumni looking for a mid-career change another means to network — connecting them with alumni living around the world.

Students can access approximately 18,000 potential networking contacts though a Career Networking link on the left hand column of the alumni Web site.

The link allows students to locate alumni by choosing a career, degree or employer and then entering geographical information.

"Sometimes you get a lot (of contact information) and sometimes you don't," said Lane Wright, who works in the Alumni Placement Office.

Wright said in order to find the most applicable contact information available, students should keep their selections general. For example, selecting many careers and leaving the degree unspecified.

Posting the information on a secure BYU Web site makes the information more readily available to students, said Fernando Nunez, who works in the alumni placement office.

Access to the site requires students' Route Y login and password. First-time users must also complete a career etiquette quiz based on posted information about how to effectively and respectfully network.

"It's common sense, but we just want to make sure they (students) know what we expect," Nunez said.

Most alumni are willing to help other alumni as long as students respectfully identify themselves and ask for advice or information, he said.

Gary D. Bartle, a database administrator and Web master based in Portland, Ore., who graduated in 2001 with a masters degree in information systems management, said he didn't realize alumni and students could access his information until a student recently contacted him.

He said the student wanted to get an opinion from someone who had gone through his same program.

> "It doesn't mean just talking to one or two people; it means talking to everyone. Most jobs are found through networking. It is probably the best way to get your foot in the door."
> Debbie Gibson
> Adviser, Career Placement Services

"It's nice for students to be able to talk to people who have been there," he said.

Wright said the university wants to protect alumni privacy while still making the contact information available, so they guard it with a quiz and a password.

Student employees like Nunez and Wright contact alumni to update their information and ask permission to post it. The office does not post information if alumni request privacy or if the alumni placement office has been unable to yet contact the alumni, Nunez said.

"Sometimes we've had alumni request not to be on the list, or they request that we only give out their business information," he said. "What you get depends on what the person requested."

The office began updating alumni information last summer. They sent a letter within the alumni magazine during summer asking alumni for contact information.

Now the office is following up, contacting those who didn't get the letter last summer through email and phone calls. The office assumes that alumni born before 1937 have retired and does not contact them.

Though Nunez said the university contacted all of the people on the list at one time or another, many of them still do not know their information is public.

Tony Grant of Las Vegas, president and owner of Tony Grant, American Society of Interior Designers and Associates, said he did not know the networking site existed, but he has no concerns about his information being posted.

"I would be happy to talk to students," said Grant, who graduated in 1979 with a degree in industrial design. "I think it (the Web site) is a great idea and a good tool for the university and students."

The alumni placement office posted the alumni list online approximately one year ago in order to save on paperwork and time, Nunez said.

Marriott School offers computer class

By JESSICA TANAKA

Computer skills can give students an edge when completing class assignments and applying for jobs. In fact, many professions require some level of knowledge in a variety of computer programs.

According to BYU's Career Placement Center, students should have abundant computer skills in applications for basic computer literacy to increase their employability. However, many students do not have the opportunity to take computer courses as part of their college curriculum.

To help sharpen students' technology skills, teaching assistants in the Marriott School of Management offer weekly computer classes as a free service to BYU students of all majors.

"Sometimes students just need a refresher or they just might not have picked it up in the first place," said Bob Kellett, a computer support representative for the Marriott School of Management. "They need a little bit of extra help."

Thomas Wheatley, a computer lab supervisor, said the computer lab staff came up with the idea to start these classes. This is the third semester the computer courses have been offered, and Wheatley said students find the classes rewarding.

"As TAs working in a lab, we wanted to offer service to other students," Wheatley said. "This is our way of giving

"The program has been successful for the students who attend," Wheatley said. "The real challenge is getting the word out to all the students."

Attendance for the classes varies depending on which application is taught, said Adam Larsen, a computer science major and computer lab TA who has previously taught courses offered in the lab.

Students do not need to sign up to attend any of the classes. They just need to show up in the Marriott School of Management computer lab at the scheduled class time.

Those who attend will have access to their own computer to follow along with the instructor.

Classes are designed for beginners, but can also be helpful for students who already have some experience in the programs.

Classes in HTML coding, Microsoft Publisher and Adobe Photoshop will be held various Wednesdays from 6-7 p.m. in room 240 of the TNRB.

This semester the TAs have already presented Microsoft PowerPoint, Excel, Access and FrontPage.

Clowning around under the big top with the Jordan World Circus

By BRITTANY WISCOMBE

Yaro and Barbara Hoffmann have made their collection of cats a way of life.

The Jordan World Circus, which is traveling through Utah this week, will makes its first stop today at the McKay Event Center in Orem.

Coming from the entertainment capitol of the world in Las Vegas, the circus presents a two-hour show filled with tricks, clowns and animals.

Many students said they are eager for the circus to come to town because it reminds them of their childhood.

"I'm so excited to see the elephants," said Mary Ellen Lee, a sophomore sociology major from Vienna, Va. "I remember that was my favorite part of the circus when I was younger."

The circus has wild and domestic animals doing tricks and interacting with the audience in an act called The Amazing Hoffmanns.

The Hoffmanns, under Yaro Hoffmann, a seventh-generation circus performer, train exotic animals and present them to audiences all over the nation.

Some of the finest species of cats are presented in this show. The Hoffmanns use two black panthers, a Royal Bengal Tiger and a Florida Panther, the rarest of all the subspecies of cougars and the only 50 known in the world, as part of the act.

"Our purpose is to educate and acquaint people with these beautiful creatures," Hoffmann said. "We also hope to raise people's level of consciousness about the need to preserve endangered species."

The show also promises trapeze acts, high diving daredevils, ranger zone riders and goofy clowns.

Shows begin at 4:30 and 7:30 p.m. Discount adult tickets are available through the McKay Events Center by calling 853-7469.

John Wayne colors the silver screen 'Yellow'

By ANGELA LEWIS-ECKSTEIN

John Wayne will appear on the big screen Thursday night in the library's auditorium when the Motion Picture Archive Film Series shows "She Wore a Yellow Ribbon," which was filmed entirely in Utah's Monument Valley.

John Wayne stars as Capt. Nathan Brittles who goes on a mission to negotiate peace with the warring Indian tribes before retiring from a long career in the cavalry.

"It is a good movie," said junior Jessica Hanaeberg, 19, from Brentwood, Calif., majoring in humanities. "It has beautiful cinematography and I like the desert in it."

The film will be projected from a rare dye transfer Technicolor print, said James D'Arc, the film series director and curator for the Motion Picture Archives.

"The colors are vivid and stable even though the print was made nearly 50 years ago," he said.

"She Wore a Yellow Ribbon" won the Academy Award in 1950 for best cinematography and color. Winton C. Hoch filmed the movie under Director John Ford.

"This is a wonderful opportunity to see such a beautiful copy on the big screen," D'Arc said.

The film was co-produced by Merian C. Cooper, and is archived as part of his personal papers in the Library's Special Collections.

"'She Wore a Yellow Ribbon' [is] arguably Ford's most extraordinary use of color, arguably John Wayne's best performance and inarguably one of Ford's greatest masterworks," according to Pacific Film Archive.

The film is part of the Motion Picture Archive Film Series but also functions as the first event of the conference Building Bridges with Folklore Archives.

"She Wore a Yellow Ribbon" will start at 7 p.m. with a short introduction by D'Arc. Doors open at 6:30. Admission is free, but seating is limited.

Playing at Muse Music's open mic night, Lisa Fraser, 23, a junior from Centerville, Utah, uses the club to get her music out to a local audience.

Audience lacking at venues

Support for local bands decreases since decline of Seattle grunge scene

By MARK MONTIE

Finding an audience is tricky for local musicians. Venues are around, but getting people out to the shows is challenging. Some are seeing a renaissance in local music interest.

"They are few and hard to find, who can make a living at [music] here in Utah," said Loki Mulholland, 30, from Orem, a financial officer at Powerquest Corp. and amateur musician.

People just aren't coming to the concerts, Mulholland said.

"It's not like we suck," Mulholland said. "Once [people] go they love it."

Being a good musician and being able to attract an audience are two different things.

"Everyone has a hard time getting their name out," said Weston Cann, 30, a computer programmer from Orem and amateur musician.

Cann helped found the Timpanogos Singer/Songwriter Alliance. The organization helps its members find performance venues and works with them to improve their skills.

There isn't a shortage of venues in the area, Cann said.

"Anyone can have a gig in their own house," said Ronda Knudsen, a member of the Timpanogos Singer/Songwriter Alliance board of directors. "If its more than $5 people don't want to come."

It isn't easy for venues to make money in this area, said Corey Fox, 34, manager of Muse Music, a venue for local artists. Fox has been involved in the Provo music business for 12 years.

"It's paying for itself, but it's always a struggle with a place like this," Fox said.

In other areas venues can make money by serving alcohol to their patrons. That doesn't work here, and no one wants to pay $10 just to come and listen to music, Fox said.

> "If guys were smart they would be taking the girls to these shows. It's music you don't have to talk to your bishop about after you listen to it."
> Loki Mulholland
> Musicisan

In the early to mid-90s there was a lot more support for local bands, Fox said.

"Back in the day there were local bands that could bring 1,000 people out," said Fox.

Fox managed the band "Clover" that sold out Kingsbury Hall.

Fox said he doesn't know why interest has waned so much since then.

One theory, he said, is that at that time Seattle had just become the center of the music world.

"Everyone wanted to be the next Seattle," Fox said.

Mulholland wonders if the lack of interest is because people in this area are more used to music. Everyone in Utah can sing or play an instrument, Mulholland said.

"If you're no good you're going to find out real quick," Mulholland said.

Back East, it's easier for local artists to attract audiences, Mulholland said, who is originally from Arlington, Va.

The Provo Arts Council has permormances at its location on Center Street every Monday night.

These performances have attracted anywhere from 20 to 450 people, said Kathryn Allen, executive director of the council.

"Everyone has their own taste," Allen said.

"I think there's plenty of advertising," Mulholland said.

The Arts Council buys spots in newspapers and distributes fliers and posters to advertise for its shows.

Fox said lately he has seen a resurgence in Provo's night life.

Knudsen agrees that interest in local talent is improving.

"I think it's evolving for the better," Knudsen said.

Monday Night Live at the Provo Arts Center and Muse Music's nightly concerts have come onto the scene in the last year.

Other venues, like the Read Leaf and Borders Books hold weekly live concerts free of charge.

Mulholland said he sees local music as a choice alternative to mainstream culture.

"If guys were smart they would be taking the girls to these shows," Mulholland said. "It's music you don't have to talk to your bishop about after you listen to it."

Group brings style on floor with jazz and hip-hop combo

Club Style gives members sense of community

By SARAH THEOBALD

Club Style at BYU performs jazz and hip-hop dancing with a unique style all its own.

"It's just really fun to give people something to do because BYU is such a big place with a lot of talented people," said the club's president, Melanie Taylor, 21, a junior from El Paso, Texas, majoring in social work. "It's something that a lot of freshmen like to join and feel a part of BYU, and it's fun for me to be able to give them that opportunity."

> "It's just really fun to give people something to do because BYU is such a big place with a lot of talented people."
> Melanie Taylor
> Club Style president

Taylor started dancing when she was four years old and started hip-hop dancing when she was in high school.

She and her roommate from freshman year, vice-president of the club, Niki Ludlow, 21, a junior from Spanish Fork, majoring in history teaching, saw that people were interested in this style of dance, so they got the club started last fall.

"We really missed performing," Ludlow said. "In college, you don't really get many opportunities to perform, and so we were just like, 'that would be cool if we started a club.' That was our dream. We always wanted to do that, and finally we started it. It has worked out really well."

About 30 members regularly attend. The club meets from 7 to 8:30 p.m. on Tuesdays in 2142 WSC.

Taylor encourages those who want to get involved in the club to come at the beginning of the semester when the dances are usually taught. She said anyone who wants to be in the club should contact her.

The club performed at homecoming, the homecoming parade and has upcoming performances.

The club is currently working on service projects.

"Next semester, we are going to put on a show, and then we'll use other talents, not just dancing," Taylor said. "We'll have some of the girls sing. We want to put on a variety show for the elderly or the Provo Teen Center."

They also have fund-raising that provides costumes for performances and takes care of other costs. They write letters to alumni that have donated money to the annual fund at BYU.

"We're going to have a big fundraiser coming up," Taylor said. "We're going to put on a big hip-hop party, and we're going to have the break dance club perform. We'll perform, and we'll have a DJ. It will cost $2 to get in."

The fund-raiser party will be from 8 p.m. to midnight on Friday, March 28, in the KMB.

Senior links past and present for BYU softball

Senior left-fielder Brooke Cadiente has been a member of the Cougar softball team since it was formed four years ago.

By EVELYN BURNS

There's only one softball player left that still remembers the days before equipment and Miller Field.

Senior left fielder Brooke Cadiente is the only member of this season's softball team remaining from the Cougars' inaugural season, four years ago.

"The program started from ground zero," Cadiente said. "It was a crazy year with no equipment and so many ups and downs."

The first softball team did not even have a field to practice or play on during its first season in existence. Miller Field was not completed until April 15, 2001.

"At first we practiced in the center of the track," Cadiente said. "It was ripped out and we played at Harmon Park on Ninth East until Miller Field was built."

Learning how to function as a team instead of individuals was not the easiest task for the Cougar Softball Team.

"It was hard to get so many new people to mesh together our first year," Cadiente said.

Cadiente said she is excited about the team' great chemistry.

"This team this year has the best chemistry and skill of any team I've seen," she said. "We're a little young, but we have girls that can flat hit, which makes the sport even more exciting."

Cadiente, who made the Mountain West Conference Tournament team and started every game last season, has been playing the sport ever since she can remember. She has endured many highs and lows in that time.

"My toughest battle as a softball player has been conquering my own self doubts and fears," she said. "I've learned that you have to remain strong in your heart and have a belief in yourself. Funnel all your aggression and determination into one."

Cadiente said that she contributes her skill and effort in the sport to her biggest influences — her parents.

"My dad and mom got me into sports, but let me play whatever I wanted," Cadiente said. "They emphasized baseball and my dad focused more on the physical, while my mom focused on the mental aspects of the game."

The sheer love of competition drives Cadiente to play the sport these days.

"I love to compete against myself and do better than I did the last time," she said. "I like doing things that are hard for me to see if I can hack it."

Cadiente said the new coaching staff is a strong point in her career as a softball player.

"We all work really well together," she said. "There's good communication between players and each other. The best interest is toward the g and they show it."

Cadiente brings not only ent, but many other strengths including softball skills to team.

"I'd like to think that I b consistency and reliability to team," she said. "People depend on me."

ss tournament was organized by the t of Corrections and John Marshall, nent of Benecard Services, Inc., a local n drug distribution company partially rmer N.J. Senate candidate Doug Forl said he chose chess because he loves nd because it "can stand the test across a."

ularity of a similar event held two prompted Marshall to bring it back. The t was not repeated last year because of campaign for the Senate — Marshall ey wanted to avoid having the event something political.

from the warden, Roy Hendricks, that s were so excited about the return of aat they pulled out their chess books to rshall said.

first chess tournament, Marshall and recruited chess master Jude Acers from as to take on the prison inmates. Acers was scheduled to make a repeat appearance this year to take on some 40 inmates but was unable to attend.

"It was on my shoulders to find a replacement," said Marshall. "That's when I realized that there is an Ivy League institution in this very county."

Marshall then contacted Ashe, president of the University chess club.

"Everyone in the club was excited, but by recommendation of Mr. Marshall, we only took our two strongest players," Ashe said.

Ashe and Prevost were each involved in more than 15 games concurrently. Because Ashe finished his original 15 matches, he picked up some of Prevost's unfinished games. The only incident to be reported was a late start.

"The young men handled themselves extremely well," Marshall said. "The inmates were great and the event went off very well."

> "I think the inmates have played chess amongst each other a lot while in prison."

Now that the event has been successful twice, Marshall predicts that the organization of the event will be much easier in the future.

He is looking to make the event annual or semi-annual — and he will continue to turn to the University's chess club for willing challengers.

"It is certainly possible to recruit grand masters from New York," Marshall said. "But, local students show such great interest, and the amateur flavor of the event adds to it."

This year, the club participated in the Pan Am games in Florida, and each year they participate in the U.S. Amateur Team East Competition.

Earlier this year they beat Harvard University and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology in a team competition. The prison tournament was their first involvement in a community outreach program.

The difficulty with outreach programs, Ashe said, is the inability to find sponsorship to help provide supplies. In the prison tournament, the chess boards and books were donated to the inmates by Benecard.Both Ashe and Prevost expressed great interest in participating in the prison chess event in the future.

"We require that you hang out with your buddy at least twice a month, phone them once a week and come to the monthly activity," he said.

The star search talent show was the club's February activity and provided a chance for the buddies to get to know each other better and just have fun, Jacobs said.

Reid Hahne, a disabled adult who emceed the show, expressed his excitement for the role he played in the event.

"I like to be the announcer," Hahne said. "I can announce all the numbers, and it's so fun."

More students are beginning to see the meaningful service opportunity as club membership has doubled in the past year, Hemmert said.

Dan Abenroth, a member of the club, said the benefits far outweigh the sacrifice.

"Not only is it fun, but it's also meaningful," said Abenroth, 21, a junior from Enumclaw, Wash., majoring in accounting. "It really makes you feel like you're contributing to individual people's lives and I enjoy that."

Johnny Jacobs, membership coordinator for Best Buddies, said he also felt the commitment is well worth the time.

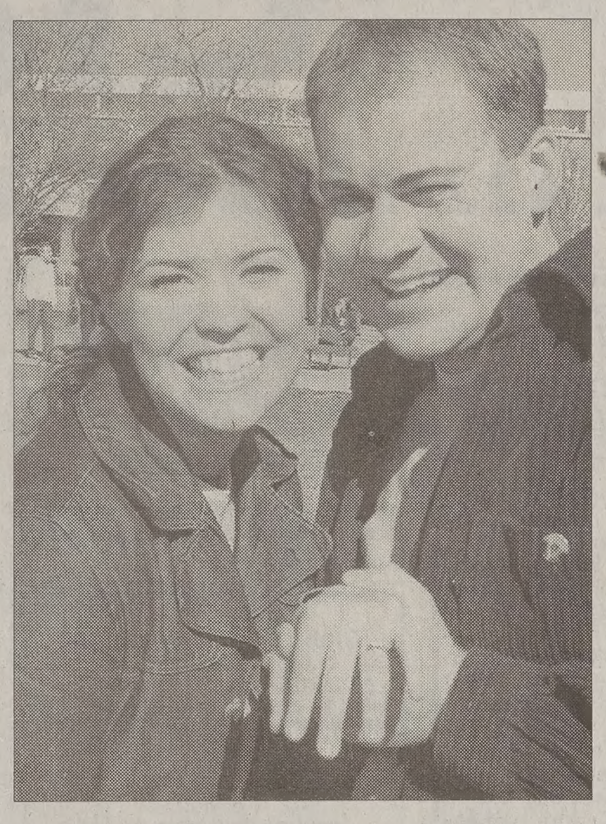
"It ends up being about two hours a month, but it is so fulfilling," Jacobs said. "It's been unbelievable. I love my best buddy."

Abenroth voiced club members' unanimous opinion that the show was a great success.

"It was fun, and there was a lot of talent," he said. "People were smiling, laughing, applauding – just having a great, fun time."

Students save for eternity

By BECCA SILVA



Riley Johanson and Dustin Walker are one of many students who wisely saved up for a ring instead of going into debt.

Because of the financial constraints of college life, BYU students looking to get married rely on careful planning and saving to afford engagement rings.

The average amount spent on engagement rings at Losee Jewelers in Provo is between $1,500 and $2,300, said Tim Murray, an employee at Losee Jewelers. The jewelers work with customers to find the right ring for the right price.

Dustin Walker, a 22-year-old from Lakewood, Colo., pre-dentistry major, used money he already had in savings, combined with income he received teaching guitar lessons and working at the Missionary Training Center, to pay for his fiancee's engagement ring.

"One thing I told Dustin was I didn't want him to go into debt," said Walker's fiancé, Riley Johanson, a 20-year-old visual arts major from Oak Hill, Va. "I think that any guy that has to pull out a loan or sell his car is ridiculous."

With engagement rings priced at almost the same amount as a full-time semester at BYU, many students take out loans to finance a ring. With a little financial planning, however, loans can be avoided.

"I had a little bit of money in the bank when I left for my mission," Walker said. "I had a CD for $500, and it had just been growing over my mission. I wasn't necessarily saving up money to buy an engagement ring, but I had savings for whenever."

Almost all banks and credit unions provide short-term share certificates that allow students to accumulate compound interest over a couple of months or years. These are ideal for students preparing for future engagement.

Students should start investing their money as early as possible, said Todd M. Martin, a BYU financial aid officer. Even students with a limited income can establish a savings account.

"I had a fund," Walker said. "I cut back on things like ski lift tickets. I'd have a certain amount of money going into rent and everything else went to the engagement ring."

Once students decide to buy a ring, setting a budget helps ensure they don't spend more than they can afford.

"Don't go over the budget," said Chad Schmidt, 24, a construction management major from Bakersfield, Calif. "Have some money and decide how much you want to spend."

Schmidt looked through magazines with his fiancee to find rings she liked. Then he compared prices from different jewelry stores. He eventually decided on a customized ring at J.G. Jewelers in Salt Lake City.

"I had a range," Walker said, "Once I had the range, I wanted to find out what was most important to me – what kind of gold, how big did I want the diamonds."

Walker customized a ring and purchased it for a discounted price through a friend in Denver.

A lot of people like to get rings custom-made, but that doesn't necessarily mean the ring will be more or less expensive, Murray said. It depends on how much detail goes into the custom work.

Whether or not a ring is custom-made, it will likely require financial planning.

"I think that it's a good start for a relationship because you learn to sacrifice for each other," Schmidt said. "And that's the first big sacrifice you make for the girl."

Lactose intolerance

Adults often suffer with problem

By TODD HOLLINGSHEAD

Alex Paulos, 25, a senior from Provo, majoring in sociology is one of many students who suffers lactose intolerance. Lactose intolerance is the inability to digest milk-sugar lactose.

Alex Paulos doesn't like to eat pizza or ice cream.

At least that's what his friends think.

Paulos, 25, a senior from Provo, majoring in sociology, is one of many students who finds himself on the wrong end of an uncomfortable digestive problem.

Paulos is lactose intolerant.

Lactose intolerance is the inability to digest the milk-sugar lactose. It results from the lack of lactase, the enzyme necessary for digesting lactose.

Many students may suffer from the symptoms without being aware of the disease.

"If you have lactose intolerance, you'll get bloating, gas and you might get into a little cramping," said Dr. Gus Hoffman of the Student Health Center. "Usually it happens a couple of hours after eating a dairy product."

Hoffman is lactose intolerant himself.

"It is a common disease affecting about 15 to 17 percent of adults," Hoffman said. "Those who have it can't tolerate milk or anything that has lactose in it."

Hoffman said about 1 percent or fewer of babies are born with the condition, but many acquire it over time.

"For people with the condition, milk and ice cream are the main problems," Hoffman said. "Cheese and yogurt are very low in lactose, so some people may be lactose intolerant and still digest them fine."

Lactose intolerance is a genetic condition that varies with each affected person. For example, some people can tolerate cheese, but they can't tolerate milk, Hoffman said.

To determine if one is lactose intolerant, Hoffman suggested a simple test: Stay away from milk and other dairy items for 10 to 14 days, then have a tall glass of milk. A return in the symptoms indicates a high possibility of lactose intolerance.

Paulos said people, usually girls, think that not being able to eat cheese or drink milk is unbearable. Paulos disagrees.

"It's not that big of a deal; you just kind of get used to it," Paulos said. "People think you need milk for calcium, but you can get it other places. If milk was healthy, they wouldn't need to push it so much in advertising."

The popularity of ads such as "Got Milk?" is evidence for an increase in recent dairy advertising.

"You don't see huge ads for broccoli in ESPN Magazine," Paulos said. "I think the guys who made the food pyramid got tipped off by the dairy farmers."

Hoffman said there are ways people who suffer from lactose intolerance can deal with it.

One option highly recommended by Hoffman is to eliminate consumption of dairy foods.

"Generally, if someone has an intestinal virus infection and keeps drinking milk, they won't be able to develop lactase," Hoffman said. "If you do get off of milk, you need to get sufficient calcium from other sources."

Some suggested sources include yogurt, fish and greens.

Another suggested method is to use lactase enzyme supplements. These lactase pills should be taken with the first bite or drink of a dairy product to assist in digesting the lactose.

But Hoffman said using lactase pills may not solve the problem.

"If you're really sensitive to lactose, you'll still react and have discomfort," Hoffman said.

Paulos said the easiest thing for him is to abstain from the dairy foods.

"I miss pizza the most," Paulos said. "I want it, but I know I can't have it because I know what it will do to me."

But having the disease is not all bad, Paulos insists.

"Milk is used to make calves turn into 900-pound heifers," Paulos said. "I'm kind of glad I'm allergic to dairy stuff. It makes me eat healthier. I'm more disciplined."

Hoffman said some lactose intolerance cases may be temporary, but most are lifetime diseases.

Utahns to help Columbia pick

By MELISSA KIMBALL

SALT LAKE CITY — Twenty Utahns will be part of a long process that will eventually bring together the lost chunks and pieces of the space shuttle Columbia.

Salt Lake County Fire Department's Wildland Team left for Texas Feb. 18 to assist in the gathering of key shuttle components critical to NASA's investigation of the fatal space mission.

Columbia broke apart on Feb. 1 during its return to Earth after a 16-day mission. As the shuttle etched its final marks across the sky, it left debris strewn over two states.

The majority of input came from law enforcement and alcohol industry, he said.

Critics of the bill said it favored large businesses over small clubs because of the flat fee, although Allen and Valentine wrote the bill to create a graduated fee structure.

Small clubs would be paying approximately $20 more per month and large clubs approximately $40 more per month in licensing fees.
